Forest, because how unrelated a tale might seem to the main storyline at first, in the end we find that it is merely a far-flung branch of the main tree. It is a great tale where the storyteller himself merges with the story. Thus ends the first volume of the greatest epic of mankind, this repository of stories within stories, the Mahabharata.

The Forest stars England's New Forest over a thousand years of development. I read it back in 2005, and still remember much of the plot today; in other words, it's a story that stays in a reader's mind. Through everyday conflicts in his characters lives--fighting over a lover, family disputes, making enough money to feed yourself, living under corrupt leaders--Rutherfurd wrote culture and ...

But the stories range from good to great. And they range in content, too, touching on a variety of themes. I'm impressed. My four favorites are: "The Forest of Time" centers around a likeable fellow lost among branching timelines. The first people he encounters are soldiers and they believe his story just enough to imagine its military ...
